Editor's Notes

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Finally, Parole can present this volume to you with current guidelines for authors. We would remind you that there are some changes. Therefore, we provide a new template and examples of presenting tables or figures and pictures, and references. In addition, we require the authors to write manuscripts in English ---for making them more got accessed---using APA styles. We publish the manuscripts in several subject areas namely both micro and macro linguistics, and language teaching.

This volume specifically presents five topics namely religion practice and its influence on Hatuhaha language shift in Central Moluccas, English verb classification markers, generic structure and cohesive devices on the final project report, illocutionary speech acts, and discourse analysis of meme use violation. Romilda Arivina da Costa investigated the religion practice and its influence on the shift of Hatuhaha language in Central Moluccas. She used both qualitative and quantitative approaches. Using two approaches, she can prove that Hatuhaha language is use on family, religion, and custom domains. Yusuf Al Arief argues against English verb classification into regular and irregular verbs. According to his analysis, these two terms are not appropriately used since both of them have regularity in different extents. Suko Raharjo and Deli Nirmala wrote about the generic structure and cohesive devices of the final project presentation of the accounting students of Polines Semarang, Central Java, Indonesia. Based the analysis, there are certain structures and cohesive devices of the presentation. The next authors, Latifah Tri Budiasih, Andayani, and Muhammad Rohmadi elaborate illocutionary speech acts used by foreign students in learning Indonesian language. They found that all five speech acts i.e. assertive, commissive, directive, declaration, and expressive are used by the respondents.

It is impossible for publishing this edition without any helps from other parties. Therefore, in this note, we would like to express our gratitude to the Dean of the Faculty of Humanities, Diponegoro University, Dr. Redyanto Noor, M.Hum for the funding, the Department Head of Linguistics, Dr. Agus Subiyanto, M.A., and the reviewers.
